National champion strategy, like many recent national technology programs, seems to represent one promising strategic thrust. This paper examines cases in several critical technological fields, namely, information technology, new biotechnology, advanced materials, nuclear power and aerospace in industrialized countries, and reaches the following preliminary conclusions: 1. The protection of national market to nurture national champion(s) is often considered. This also concerns the decision about the appropriate number of champions. In practice, however, the size of the potential market is very difficult to predict at the early stages of the product life cycle. Therefore, most initial decision making is rather subjective, and should thus be adapted to new situations. The inclusion of foreign markets in the strategic thinking from the beginning appears crucial to the ultimate success of a champion strategy. 2. Small countries with small domestic markets relative to a presumably minimum threshold size would find it difficult to insulate their national champion(s), if any, from international competition. But systems technologies and applications fields which justify internalization provide many opportunities for small countries, and certainly large ones, to bolster their national champions through a protected domestic market. 3. Single champion strategy along with protracted market protection is risky due to the absence of competition pressure.
